"Over the past several years, it has been our experience at Nabholz that ULM School of Construction Management graduates seem to be better prepared to add value faster when they join our company compared to some other universities we recruit from. A key differentiator is the quality of the ULM faculty. They all have significant hands-on experience in the construction industry. Their experience helps students better prepare for the 'real world.' Another factor is the Nabholz internship model. Our approach is to rotate interns through various functions of the business (e.g. estimating/preconstruction, project management/production, niche business units, etc.) to expose them not only to what we do, but to how we do it.

companies that offer high-paying internships. All the professors have ten years or more of construction experience, providing them with a network of contacts in the industry. Our professors use these contacts to help students land their dream internships/jobs."

"Advanced Projects brings together all the different skills that our students have learned during their time in the School of Construction Management. The students individually select a commercial construction project and use the plans and specs to develop a greater understanding of the project and what they have learned.
